Dear Reader,

Due to carelessness of the author's butler, most of the sequence following the action on the other page, was lost in last week's laundry!!

The next scenes are all the world will ever know about how this adventure ended.....

Actions beat words

"LISSEN", Suitcase," said the swart, beetle-browed man grimly, "I may be a hick from Chicago but no smart aleck from New York's going to make me believe that any guy can do what you say this Plastic Man does. Get me?" he concluded, glaring angrily and with disbelief at the group surrounding him.

"Well, believe it or not, as you like," said the suave one called Suitcase, with a shrug. "You'll find out what I say is true before you're in this town very long. And," he continued with a knowing glance at his comrades, "if you bump into that character for business or pleasure, buddy, watch out!"

"Ahh," growled the stranger, "you can't tell me any guy can reach all the way across a city street and flip a rod out of me hand." To prove his point he pulled a gleaming automatic out of his shoulder holster, and fondled it tenderly, first in one hand then in the other. "You see," he continued, with a gruff laugh, "me, and 'Little Poison,' here, have been together too long to be separated that easy—we're too smart for 'em."

On the other side of town Plastic Man and his friend Woozy were talking. Plas was stretched out across the room—his body on a couch on one side and his feet crossed comfortably on a hassock on the other side.

"Woozy," he said sharply, "this town is awfully dead. Let's go someplace where we'll get excitement."

"Like where, for instance, Plas?" asked Woozy, a big bubble of gum hiding his caricature of a face. "Plop" went the bubble, then Woozy continued. "'Sides, I think you'll find some excitement around here soon, 'cause I saw a guy today at the railroad station who might make things interesting."

"Who was that?" said Plas, shooting his head across the room so that he was nose to nose with his friend.

"Well," said Woozy indecisively, "this guy is with 'Suitcase' Burke; y'know he's the hood they call 'Suitcase' 'cause he always carries a .45 calibre typewriter in one—well, there the two of 'em are in the station and I overheard 'em talking about a big job. Anyway, I hear 'Suitcase' callin' him 'Cuddles' an' I figured it must be 'Cuddles' Fonteleroy, the big trigger and bullet man from out West."

"Yeah, guess you're right—that's who it must be," said Plas, nodding his head vigorously in a long arc from ceiling to floor. "Did you overhear any more?" he asked, an eager look lighting his features.

"Seems they were planning a little job on the 15th Avenue National Bank for four this afternoon."

Without getting up, Plastic Man stuck his head into the kitchen to look at the kitchen clock, pulled it back and jumped to his feet. "C'mon," he said to Woozy, "it's 3:50 now—we've no time to lose."

Out on the street, Plas set off at a terrific rate of speed towards 15th Avenue—three blocks away. Woozy, with a great wad of bubble gum in his cheek, seeing he couldn't keep up with Plas, followed in a taxi. Plas slowed down as he approached the 15th Avenue National Bank, thinking it would not do to make a commotion. Taking up a position across the street, he squeezed his plastic form into an empty ash can, slipped the lid on it so he could watch the bank, and waited.

A minute later Woozy tapped the can and whispered, "Here they come now, Plas. Better be ready!"

As their quarries sauntered down the street in front of the bank unconcernedly, Plas saw "Suitcase" slip in the door that had opened to let an employee out. Then he saw "Cuddles" reach for his gun. It was time to act. Rising half way out of the can, he shot one arm across the street, through the door and hauled the bewildered "Suitcase" out of the bank by the scruff of the neck. At the same time his other hand shot out toward "Cuddles" and deftly removed the thug's rod from his shoulder holster. Then slowly, almost aimlessly, he walked across the street to talk to the chastened criminals while Woozy called the cops.

THEN I discovered my marvelous new muscle-building system—"Dynamic Tension." And it turned me into such a complete specimen of MANHOOD that today I hold the title "THE WORLD'S MOST PERFECTLY DEVELOPED MAN."
